ABOUT...

Miss Representation is a documentary directed by Jennifer Siebel Newsom that highlights the objectification and misrepresentation of women in the media, government, and workforce. The film explains the different ways the media takes advantage of how the ideal woman should look like and act. For example, ever since women are little girls, they are convinced men's independence translates into women's dependence on them. Stereotypes like the one mentioned above have significant negative impact on our society and female development.

According to the documentary, the underrepresentation of women in the media can lead to mental health problems such as depression and anxiety as well as substance abuse and domestic violence. It is up to our generation to put an end to female objectification. Miss Representation calls for policy change, awareness, mentorship, education and asks its viewers to visualize a world with more female leaders, gender equality, and a diverse media, government, and workforce. Representation, diversity and respect are the answers.

Society specifically the advertising industry profits from objectifying and hyper-sexualizing women. Through this ambient, pedestrians passing by will be able to see their broken reflection in the large-sized shattered mirror. The broken mirror and distorted reflection serve as a symbol for the way women see themselves as the media portray them. The idea is that pedestrians passing by read the quote by Sadiga Thorton and take control of the objectification narrative by recognizing what the media are doing. They will raise awareness by taking a selfie and sharing it with friends and family.

Through the large touch screen, park goers and pedestrians will be able to interact with the documentary's content. The screen offers an "About" page in which users can get familiar and educate themselves with the documentary's pressing issue: women's underrepresentation and misrepresentation in the media. They can also use the screen to take the pledge to end women objectification in the media, interact and raise awareness with the documentary's directors and other viewers through social.
